“Governing A Changing World”

Oran Young, Durwood Zaelke, and Matthew Stilwell

Tuesday, April 8, 2003
7:30 p.m.
Bren Hall 1414

Renowned international political scientist Oran Young, now on the faculty of the Bren School, and his colleagues Durwood Zaelke and Matthew Stilwell from the Center for International Environmental Law (CIEL), will introduce a new program, Governance for Sustainable Development (GSD) that studies governance systems in world affairs and how these can be adapted to the challenges of sustainable development. This open forum, pertinent to those in academia and the public and private sectors, will feature a short presentation and segue into community discussion on the issues of governance that we face as a global community today.

For more information about GSD, please call the program office at (805) 893-8747, or visit www.bren.ucsb.edu/news/events/index.asp.

Oran Young is founder and co-director of GSD. The author of recent books, including Governance in World Affairs and The Institutional Dimensions of Environmental Change: Fit, Interplay, and Scale, he is a leading figure in the global environmental change research community. Durwood Zaelke is a founder and co-director of GSD. He is director of the International Network for Environmental Compliance and Enforcement (INECE), and he founded and served as the first president of the Center for International Environmental Law (CIEL) in Washington, DC and Geneva. His text entitled International Environmental Law and Policy is widely used in law school courses on international environmental affairs. Matthew Stilwell is a founder and the managing director of the GSD. He also serves as legal counsel to United Environment Programme’s Economics and Trade Branch, and advisor to a range of partners in civil society, governments, and inter-governmental organizations on issues of international law and policy.
